The ancient Greeks coined the words "taste" and "smell" to mean the sensations arising from the mouth and nose, respectively. But it is a little-known fact (to either the ancient Greeks or to people today) that the perception of food taste is determined to a large degree by olfaction, not gustation.

Sensation and Perception, Fourth Edition

Perception deals with the interpretation of those signals. What does a specific pattern of activity in our nervous system tell us about the world outside? Perception is likely to depend more on experience than sensory reception does. That said, a division between sensation and perception will not be clearly marked. It can't really be done.
